SHORT SYNOPSIS

A luxury hotel in a conflict zone. Development aid worker Dorothea hosts fundraising galas, schmoozing and boozing with potential donors. An affair with a young drifter, Alec, starts as sweet distraction but brings her dangerously close to losing control.

LONG SYNOPSIS

A luxury hotel somewhere in the Arab conflict zone. Outside, tanks surround the building; inside, German development aid worker Dorothea (Maria Furtwängler) is waiting for the war in the neighboring country to end. She's a freelancer, busy coordinating an aid project that grants scholarships to refugee girls to study at a London College. In order to raise the necessary funds, she hosts charity receptions and gala dinners, successfully wooing the ambassadors of rich countries for support. Dorothea's prowess in this area is partly down to the excessive alcohol consumption that keeps her on her party feet and also helps to keep the gnawing occupational cynicism at bay. At one of these events she meets Alec (Mehmet Sözer), a much younger drifter, who is only too happy to accept Dorothea's material support as "payment in kind". But what starts as a sweet distraction becomes perilous when the project starts to founder. The refugee tents on the closed border are empty and the only girl eligible for the scholarship has disappeared. When Headquarters arrives on the scene, in the person of Dorothea's boss Aurelie (Anne von Keller), and casts doubt on the extension of her contract, Dorothea develops a sudden distaste for Alec's parasitic lifestyle. As her professional and private lives become increasingly entangled, Dorothea comes dangerously close to losing control.

DIRECTORS NOTE by Isabelle Stever

I once met a woman who worked for a UNO affiliated development aid organization. She vividly described to me how a colorful assortment of aid workers, war reporters, politicians and PR managers on the "conflict hot-spot circuit" would meet up in the lounges of international hotels, where they'd self-medicate with drugs and have wild parties. These people are in the poverty business: their networking, rivalries and sycophantic strategies are all played out against the backdrop of the "real" horrors of crisis zones as portrayed by the media.

An idea began to germinate within me about the connection between this absurd reversal of expectation – the aid worker’s existential dependency on crisis – and an amour fou as a partnership of convenience; a relationship in which mutual dependencies are repeatedly turned on their heads, finally escalating to preposterous proportions: the story of Dorothea and a lover half her age, Alec. The result is a disillusioning look at a decadent parallel world that is finding it increasingly difficult to cut itself off from the rest of humanity and to justify its own existence. It is a polished world of pomp and perfect manners, a key ingredient of which is a conscientious “care for the poor” – including the missionary ambition of converting “them” to one’s own lifestyle.

It’s already become impossible for Dorothea to maintain the façade without giant blinkers on.

Actually, not even then, because the lone object of her aid program – Sukaina, the refugee girl with a scholarship to London – literally goes her own way.

At the very end Dorothea finally leaves this bubble. But by this time she has herself already been deserted by that to which she had so frantically clung: her clearly ordered world; her idea of love; her definition of beauty; her belief in her own unconditional entitlement to wealth and pleasure; and her youth.
